Study and discussion questions:

1. Examine the statements about contemporary religion put forth by James Carroll. He appears to believe that, under the proper conditions, religion can be a positive force in international affairs. Would you agree or disagree with this notion?
2. Discuss the differences between Jihad and "McWorld." Which one of these forces does the United States represent? Also, examine the "four imperatives" of McWorld. Are they really incompatible with the forces of jihad?
3. What do you think a Muslim would say about the "unswerving embrace of objectivity and impartiality" of science and modernism (enlightenment) in general?
4. Do you agree with Barber that "capitalism and democracy have a relationship, but it is something less than a marriage"? Discuss Barber's image of jihad and its natural, innate conflict with "McWorld." What are some of the examples he points to?
5. Interestingly, Lewis suggests in his article that "Anglo-French rule and American influence, like the Mongol invasions, were a consequence, not a cause, of the inner weakness of Middle Eastern states and societies." What direction then does this point those nations of the Middle East to go in order to regain "strength and greatness"?
6. Discuss Mead's analysis of the relationship that the evangelical community in the U.S. has in influencing our foreign policy. Does Mead see it as a net positive or negative? Do you agree or disagree with him?
7. The documentary Beyond Our Differences makes the case that religion can be a positive force in the world and in international affairs. This goes against the grain of what many people (especially in the West) believe. What is your take on the film's message? Does the media play a role in shaping people's opinions about the ability of religion to play a positive role?
